The building interiors did not meet the contemporary trends and sentiments of the new generation of tenants. That's why the business center owner felt like changing the design of public areas, making them more modern and memorable. The objective was to make renovation in the shortest possible time and, preferably, without dismantling. Architects made drastic changes to the appearance of the business center public areas, in the context of limited work scope and budget. So they made ample use of light and color. Color highlights on the coffee house's and the elevator lobby's functional areas created the intuitive navigation and transformed the classical space visually. Structural "cubicles" along the traffic flows of the business center visitors were the key innovation in the space arrangement.
